Saine opposes gun control and joined a lawsuit to overturn Colorado's red flag law

"Appeals court finds lawmakers can challenge red flag law's validity." Colorado Politics, 11/10/21

Colorado's second-highest court has ruled that two Republican legislators may proceed with their challenge to a landmark gun safety law after allegedly being denied their constitutional right to have the legislation read at length.

A three-judge panel for the Court of Appeals on Wednesday partially reversed a Denver judge's decision that initially labeled the lawsuit a "political question," in which courts should not intrude on the prerogatives of the other branches of government. Since his decision, the state Supreme Court decided in an unrelated case that the judicial branch may, in fact, review whether the legislature complied with the constitutional mandate for the reading of bills.

The appellate panel relied on that case in ruling that Reps. Dave Williams, R-Colorado Springs, and Lori Saine, now a Weld County commissioner, could litigate whether the presiding officer of the House of Representatives infringed on their state constitutional right to have a bill be read at length in the absence of unanimous consent otherwise.
